An excited crowd gathered to show their support for the Democratic candidates in the Californian State election, namely Jerry Brown (for Governor) and Gavin Newsom (for Lieutenant Governor). Jerry Brown and Bill Clinton, are old foes who have put aside their past, to rally together for the future of California, in a campaign that Clinton described as “So essential”. Clinton described Jerry Brown as a man who looks towards the future and a man with California’s future generations in his heart. In a talk which focused on the importance of grassroots campaigning for this particular election, Clinton encouraged all democratic voters to support this election and Brown to ensure the future economy of California and the future of clean energy in the state. This gathering and other rallies with Clinton and Brown were used to counter-balance Meg Whitman’s campaign which positioned the two democratic players as incompatible; their joining of forces was to ensure a strong democratic front in California. USABF Chairman Kevin Kaul was there to represent the Asian Communities platform in this election, as an influential group in the future of the state.
